1. Steve Biko founded the Black Consciousness movement, which was closely linked to the armed group Umkhonto we Sizwe, fighting for independence in South Africa, as opposed to SWAPO's struggle for independence in South West Africa (Namibia). 2. According to the SA Police, Steve Biko died from a hunger strike. 3. I first met Donald Woods while he was waiting for Steve, who had been expecting him at his church visit. 4. The film 'Cry Freedom' was directed by Richard Attenborough. 5. Vorster served as Prime Minister when Steve Biko was killed in 1977. 6. My children swam in the backyard pool while I talked to Donald about their first interview with Steve, who had been a doctor before being banned from his clinic due to his activism The clinic received financial support from churches and mining companies, with the latter making occasional donations. Wendy expressed surprise that South African mining companies would provide funding for a poverty-stricken medical clinic. Wilton starred in films like "Pride and Prejudice" (2005), "Shaun of the Dead", and "Blame It on the Bellboy". Woods was arrested at Jo'burg airport and placed under house arrest, marking the beginning of his remarkable escape. He edited the South African newspaper Daily Dispatch from 1965 until he was forced to quit due to house arrest. In response to Donald's views on apartheid, Tenjy expressed her desire for better education and job opportunities for herself and her community. Woods reassured her that this could happen if it meant gaining resources for further education and employment. Tenjy was later detained by the South African police, which outraged Woods and Steve. The driver who helped Woods cross the border from South Africa to Lesotho was Moses. In another scene, Jane Woods, one of Don's children, told her mom that she had trouble sleeping. She was startled by the phone ringing, so she asked her mother if they had received any further threats in support of Steve Biko. Jane proposed using a tape recorder to capture the type of threats they received and expose them to the press, but Wendy expressed concerns about censorship laws. Jane then announced she would be heading downstairs to make some coffee, but Wendy instructed her daughter to stay in her room due to a suspicious noise. Suddenly, gunshots were heard, causing Jane and her mother to jump in fright.
